Building a Future-Ready Workforce with Job Fit

Advancements in technology are not just changing processes and automating tasks—they are changing the way we work and surfacing new ways to develop talent. As AI and automation reshape traditional roles, leaders must bridge the gap between current skills and future demands. Forward-thinking talent leaders are focusing on identifying high-potential employees who can be upskilled or reskilled to fill new and emerging positions.

Success in this transition depends not only on technical training but also on ensuring optimal job fit—matching employees' inherent strengths, work styles, and cognitive abilities to these newly crafted roles. Rather than solely relying on external hiring, leaders recognize the value of investing in their existing talent pool, leveraging organizational knowledge while building new technical competencies.

Read on to discover how this strategic job fit approach creates a more adaptable, future-ready workforce capable of driving innovation and maintaining competitive advantage in an ever-evolving world.

WHAT IS JOB FIT?

Job fit is the degree of congruence between an individual's cognitive and behavioral traits, and interests in a job and work environment in relation to the open position. When a person's characteristics fit those required by the job, the organization benefits from a good job fit. Establishing job fit helps identify and place individuals in positions where they are likely to perform at their full potential.

Based on identifying innate personality traits, abilities, and behaviors, assessing for job fit determines:

- If a person can do the job
- How they will do the job
- Whether they will enjoy the job

Every human being is motivated and driven by different influences. Job fit outlines the unique job-related qualities that make a person productive.

WHY YOU SHOULD CARE ABOUT JOB FIT

Studies show that proper job fit improves engagement and job satisfaction, resulting in increased productivity. Meanwhile negative factors such as job-related stress, tension, workplace conflict, and costly employee turnover act to diminish productivity.

Smart organizations succeed with a philosophy that matches people to jobs. Having followed 360,000 people through their careers during a period of 20 years, a major study published by Harvard Business Review demonstrated that a key ingredient in retaining people is ensuring that they are matched to their jobs in terms of their abilities, interests, and personalities.

The study found that when you put people in jobs where the demands of the job matched their own abilities, the stimulation offered by the job matched their interests, and the cultural demands of the position matched their personalities, staff turnover decreased dramatically, and productivity increased drastically.

Employees who are well matched to their jobs are 2.5 times more productive.

SEE WHAT'S BELOW THE SURFACE

Only a small percent of a person's capabilities and potential can be observed on the surface. The rest, like thinking style, behavioral traits, and interests—those will take some digging. According to Harvard Business Review, the “job fit” approach accurately predicts job success more than any of the commonly accepted factors, such as education, experience, or job training. While an individual might be a high-performing sales person working for Business X in California, that doesn't mean that person will perform at the same level in a new role with Business Y in Texas.

A common misconception about establishing job fit, and/or assessing employees, is that people can answer incorrectly on the assessment. In fact, there are no right or wrong answers, or pass and fail results. It is simply about establishing how suitable a person is for a role and predicting their level of performance on the job. Just as no single person is perfect, there is no perfect job match.

Top reasons employees fail

1. Not a good fit for the job
2. Don't fit the company culture
3. Didn't fit the team

REPLICATE TOP PERFORMERS IN 3 SIMPLE STEPS

It's easy to recognize top performers when you see them in action or review their numbers. The challenge is understanding what makes these people successful, and ensuring future candidates share these success factors.

01

Identify and Assess Top Performers

Find the employees who can outperform their peers. Look at sales performance, output volume, quality metrics, customer satisfaction, and other KPIs.

Use PXT Select® to outline the behaviors, traits, and identify the attributes most important to you.

02

Create a Performance Model

Build a performance model to leverage the best attributes that distinguish top performers in your organization.

03

Evaluate Future Candidates Against the Performance Model

Easily spot future hires who share common traits with the most successful people, so you know exactly what to look for.

THE IMPACT OF IDENTIFYING JOB FIT

A good job fit is lucrative. Gallup research has shown that companies with a ratio of 9.3 “engaged” employees (those who are emotionally connected with their jobs) for every “disengaged” employee, saw 147 percent higher earnings per share on average, when compared with their competitors.

But while good fit can help companies make money, poor job fit is costly. So much so that some businesses are now even offering employees cash to quit their jobs, if they feel it’s not the right fit. Companies like Amazon offer employees thousands of dollars to leave, to weed out those who don’t value the organizational mission. Amazon CEO Jeff Bezos said in his shareholder letter, “The goal is to encourage folks to take a moment and think about what they really want. In the long-run, an employee staying somewhere they don’t want to be isn’t healthy for the employee or the company.”

Did you know?

Gallup estimates that “active disengagement” costs the US $450 to $550 billion a year.

IT'S ABOUT MORE THAN MONEY

Establishing and hiring for job fit at the start of the employee lifecycle helps organizations ensure they are in the black and not in the red. But turnover affects more than a company's bottom line or stock price; it impacts morale, the company's reputation, and productivity.

Maybe it will help if you look at yourself from an employee point of view. If every part of you loves to get up for work, thrives in your work environment, and is proud to be associated with your business, you're not only going to be productive, but also highly engaged. When job fit has been established, you become committed to the organization and its goals. If you fit the job, you're less likely to leave the organization. But instead, you'll grow as a highly-productive and engaged employee. It's more than engagement—it's ownership. When employees take ownership, you are more likely to take initiative without being pushed, as you strive to perform.

“Hiring the right people takes time, the right questions, and a healthy dose of curiosity.”

-Richard Branson

HOW JOB FIT ASSESSMENTS HELP YOU HIRE, DEVELOP, AND RETAIN YOUR PEOPLE

Job fit assessments help you make better hiring decisions by helping you understand the core characteristics needed to perform successfully in a given role. Hiring solutions such as PXT Select® measure the essential behavior characteristics an employer needs to make the most intelligent hiring and selection decisions. Job fit assessments help talent acquisition professionals and hiring managers predict job suitability, and accurately helps assist in matching people with the work they will do in their new jobs.

There are many kinds of employee assessments available, but the most successful hiring assessments use job fit as a tool to increase consistency and success in the hiring process. Job fit solutions combine tested and reliable data derived from employee assessments with customized data to create a benchmark, which will match candidates to the specific job and company.

The employees are assessed with the following 20 core characteristics:

Thinking Style

- Composite Score
- Verbal Skill
- Verbal Reasoning
- Numerical Ability
- Numerical Reasoning

Behavioral Traits

- Pace
- Assertiveness
- Sociability
- Conformity
- Outlook
- Decisiveness
- Accommodation
- Independence
- Judgment

Interests

- Technical
- Creative
- Financial/Admin
- Enterprising
- People Service
- Mechanical

CREATING A JOB FIT PROFILE

The data collected from the assessment is used to create a unique job fit profile, becoming the foundation for the skills and characteristics required by the company for selecting and hiring talented people.

With the job profile analysis, multiple managers can weigh their opinions and express views regarding a specific position. Once the job analysis has been completed, managers' responses are entered in the assessment center for processing. The result is a unique job fit profile, which is called a "performance model."

The job fit lifecycle

Organizations that utilize job fit data know it's a key part of talent development at all stages of the employee lifecycle. Instead of focusing on a good or bad fit, companies use the report data as a tool to identify areas where employees need training and development.

Candidates applying or under consideration for a job take the assessment to produce their cognitive, behavioral, and interests profile. Then, their profile is compared to the performance model for the job. This helps determine where the candidate shares common characteristics to those required to be successful in the job.

In addition to providing information about a candidate's personal characteristics, the job fit assessment will provide personalized interview questions that are prepared specifically for a candidate, based on their assessment results. These specific interview questions, which follow Department of Labor guidelines for fairness in hiring, can be used by hiring managers during the interviewing process to dig deeper and understand a candidate's potential areas of strength and opportunity.

SPOTTING A JOB FIT CHALLENGE

Even when you identify an employee that may seem suitable for a job, their performance or motivations may change over time. This means another available job at your company could be the right move for an employee who no longer fits his or her current position—or who could be ready for another challenge. It's not easy to identify employees who are up for a job change. Managers oversee numerous employees and are often consumed by making sure everything gets done. Employees themselves often do not realize the problem is related to job fit.

The job fit lifecycle

Problem: Performance has decreased.

Solution: If it's clear that the employee can be a star performer, identify a job that will challenge them. Hopefully, the change of pace will be exactly what the employee needs to return to their previous level of engagement.

Problem: Skill set has increased.

Solution: Instead of losing your employees to other companies once they receive more education, identify open positions you have that will match their new skill sets.

Problem: Boredom has set in.

Solution: Organizations need to be flexible and nimble to meet the needs of the market. They need to be in a continuous, proactive talent selection mindset so they can constantly be matching the right people to the right job.

OPTIMIZE YOUR TALENT FOR FIT

Did you know?

According to Glassdoor, attracting high quality candidates is the top challenge for 76% of hiring managers.

When you think about your employees, you might subconsciously categorize them into performance groups of go-getters, passive contributors, and those in the middle. While some are outgoing and aggressive, others go quietly about their day in workmanlike fashion. The important thing to remember is that in an organization, in a team, it takes all types. If everyone was a go-getter, there might be confrontation or a battle for time and resources. You need the quiet, behind-the-scenes players to keep an equilibrium.

Optimizing talent in your organization is an important goal that is always changing. The types of people you hire, develop, and promote should represent different skill sets, backgrounds, and levels of expertise to fulfill the various roles that make up your company. If you've hired someone you thought was a good candidate, only to find they're not as qualified as the interview process led you to believe, then this is a good case to begin using assessments to improve the likelihood of success of your new hires.

"Competency is not enough. Job fit is the key to better hiring decisions."

-Lou Adler

HIRING DOWN TO ITS CORE

Job fit is one of the most important elements that affect how an employee performs at their job and how engaged they are while doing it.

Job fit is more important than experience, education, or training. It gets to the core of who a person really is. There is no “perfect job.” Every person or company is unique with a series of strengths, weaknesses, cultures, and characteristics. When identified, combined, and utilized, they can be a powerful tool in maximizing workplace satisfaction, productivity, and engagement. One of the most important elements which affect how an employee performs at their job—and how engaged they are while doing it—is job fit.

-Jack Welch
